Nuke

I naturally thought it was funny when I saw a worker wearing a hearing aid.

To say I was glad to be back on top would be an understatement. I thought about kissing the ground, but decided against it because it might be irradiated.

Our next stop was the Project Sedan crater.

The crater was formed on July 6, 1962, as part of the government's Plowshare Program, a program designed to develop peaceful uses for nuclear explosives.

Looking at the hole this test created, it's hard to believe this test could have the area.

The area is off-limits to test site workers, according to a sign I saw.

I saw another sign that forbid workers from removing rocks or objects from the area.

What a scary place — it sent chills through my bones to know I was just a few feet away from a place where a nuclear explosion took place.

And even more scary was the reality that a bus door, a simple door was all that was keeping me away from some irradiated materials that, if I were exposed to them, could some day be of harm to me.

ever been used for peaceful purposes.

After leaving the crater, Fancis told us there would be an hour-long drive until we reached our final destination, Frenchman's Flat.

On the way, I saw remnants of the old "Doom Town" that was used to study the effects of a city struck by a nuclear weapon.

Frenchman's Flat is a cold-hearted place that still shows signs of tests conducted nearly 30 years ago.

Old shacks, concrete domes and a crumbled railroad bridge surrounding
