tor, after whom the building was named, donated $500,000 and J.A. Tiberti, a Las Vegas builder, donated $400,000.

The magnitude of the building has grown from 8,000 square feet to 23,000 square feet and went from $800,000 to its current price.

This two-story, two-wing building was designed by Gerald Garapich and Associates.

Albrecht said the new alumni center will allow the University's Alumni Relations office to expand its programming, host social functions like class reunions, honor scholarship luncheons and dinners, and start a student alumni center.

It will also house the Alumni Association offices, campus visitation center, a faculty club and a small art gallery.

Albrecht said in the past alumni relations had seminars in which alumni could come back and speak on various topics for students.

But now that the university is growing there are no rooms to rent out, he said.

The Alumni center will allow them to invite alumni to come back and get directly involved with students about various career opportunities, said Albrecht. "By having our own facility we can control our own destiny."

Scholarships system complies with regulations

Sandi Cardinal, director of Internal Audit for UNLV presented various recommendations to the UNS Board of Regents at their meeting on Oct. 19.

Cardinal said she studied the Tonopah Residence Hall. "We looked at the responses from the residence hall and made some recommendations concerning areas of problems to the regents," she said.

There are four main recommendations: The first recommendation was to have armored car service to take deposits to the bank. Cardinal added that this will be starting in October.

The next recommendation was to make sure that students who have a financial hold on their record not be allowed to register for classes.

One incident occurred where a student was allowed to do this even though there was a financial hold put on the student. "The lack of computerization on records was perceived to be the problem," Cardinal said.

Another recommendation was to have receipts sent to the controller's office each semester.

The final recommendation was to develop a procedures manual for the university by June, 1990.

According to Cardinal everything recommended has either been done or is being worked on. Most of the problems involved procedures, especially keeping track of things such as equipment and so on.

The Board of Regents' response to the recommendations was to ask UNLV's vice-president of Finance and Administration, Buster O'Neal to report to them when the rest of the items are completed.

"The regents were concerned and wanted to make sure the recommendations were being made and that they are being followed through," Cardinal said.
