Daring to live their dreams

Maggie's Dreams look for success with hard work.

Maggie's Dream
by Bret Skiba

The band Maggie's Dream has been out now for about five months, and they are finding it very desirable to be on a major label. Formed in New York in 1990, the band is trying to become a hit with their self-titled album on Capitol records. The band took its name from a novel written by James P. Cromer titled "Maggie's American Dream." The band members cite such groups as Parliament and a number of 70's rock bands as inspiration but not as a patterning influence on their music. Having a sound which resembled Lenny Kravitz (to me), an apparent influence must exist somewhere.

Getting into the business because they felt it was a destiny of sorts, and that it was what they had wanted to do for a long time, the group is confident of their music and of their future success. Concerning many of the issues which plague the music industry today, the band members feel that lyrics with a strong meaning are very important and that things like commercialism are just money making schemes.

They are also discouraged by those who lip-sync, stating that it doesn't capture the true, raw sound of a band. An album can cover up this sound because you can do more on an album than you can on stage. This could only mean that they must put on a great show live, because the album they have out doesn't contain too many over-indulgent qualities.

Unlike most bands, "Maggie" didn't find their way to success in the usual fashion by playing endlessly in local clubs and attracting a huge following. They were spotted by Capitol records first and then signed for the sound and style of their music. It just proves that if one dares to dream and work hard enough, anything is possible.
