

How do you think the current recession will affect graduating students and what advice can you offer?

Marilyn Ming, senior, communication

"I've sent out several resumes and haven't gotten one call back. I'm applying for graduate school but I am concerned about the job market. A public relations job (my field) may be the first to go because they are considered "dispensable positions."

Kristine Miller, junior, hotel administration

"I think there will be a problem. The hotel industry will be the first to lay off. People won't travel so the hotels will cut down on their employees. I am concerned jobs will be scarce. So I'm seeking a balance of work experience and a good grade point average to be in the top percentage. Today, you have to market yourself."

Jennifer Condit, junior, education

"I'm kind of scared. If the recession affects the actual rate of pay in California and if I decide to teach for the system there, I'll be living near the poverty level."

Vince Alberta, graduate student, communication

"I think the recession is already affecting students. The job market for students has been dwindling since the mid-1980's even before the major corporations started their huge lay-offs. You need to look for any advantage to make yourself more attractive—a master's degree or a possible Ph.D. along with experience. To get a good job, students will have to sacrifice more of their personal time to prepare."
