tion board is in the process of developing one.

"There really is no policy as of yet," Spray said. "But if there is more than one group that comes in then we'll divide it equally."

Although there are no formal guidelines as of yet Spray said the questions must have something to do with UNLV.

"If it's something pertinent to the elections and student interest then we'll do it," she said.

Spray said the idea is an attempt to get students involved in student government. "We generally don't allow students to do this," Spray said, "but we're trying to open it up and get students involved."

A scantron will be used in the election with the candidates listed first and any questions submitted will be limited by the space left on ballot.

In this election, students will be asked if they agree, disagree or don't think certain campus issues are important to them. The list of subjects on the ballot includes:

- Campus safety
- Student Health
- Tuition

- Sexual assault and rape
- Discrimination
- Aids
- The environment and recycling
- Mandatory student fees
- The quality of education

Spray said part of the reason for some of the questions on this ballot is the Young Democrats plan to hold a debate later in the semester and wait to get a feel for what students care about.

Spray said that other groups have also asked for the same chance and in the future she plans to try to accommodate all comers.

"I'm trying to run a fair and unbiased election," Spray.

said running against his boss was a tough decision, but he felt he had "a lot to offer students." He too has been involved in Student Government beyond his current position. He was a senator of Student Development and a senator of liberal arts.

Romero said he would like to see Student Government be more accountable to students and be available when they need it.

"As Senate president, you are representing all the students," he said, "and you should be there to hear from them so you know what's going on."

An expanded recycling effort is also in Romero's plan. He would like to work with the Environmental Protection Agency and ARA food services to make the effort go beyond campus offices.

As for changes in Student Government, Romero will work on "informing new senators of what goes on so they can feel comfortable and understand right away." He said new senators often come in and are not quite sure how Student Government works, and he would like to see an easier transition for these senators.

The third candidate in this race, Clinton, is a new face to Student Government. He previously served as a freshman class treasurer at Florida Memorial College in Miami. Additionally, he was co-founder and president of the pre-law association, has been involved in debate, is part of the honors program and political science society.

Clinton would like to see a change in Student Government. He said they have "developed a group think" where everyone agrees and votes like one another. He attributed this to the fact that his opponents have held positions in Student Government for quite some time.

"When students come and go, they leave something for other students to build upon," Clinton said. "If they are monopolizing Student Government, I don't think anyone benefits from it."

Accountability to the students is an area where he feels Student Government could improve. He said that current Senate president "doesn't ask students what they want."

Senate

Student Government offices.

Ken Tomory, a former member of the Student Senate, said most students don't participate because of the Senate's lackadaisical attitude.

"They need to work on their planning methods," Tomory said.

"When I was a senator there was no plan on how to handle the finances, there was just a simple balance sheet and when you're dealing with large sums of money you need a solid game-plan."

Benneman recently spoke to two classes regarding current issues at UNLV and said he plans to make students more aware.

"The students responded enthusiastically," Benneman said.

"They seemed to be genuinely concerned."

Any student wishing to get involved in the Senate can run in the elections that occurs every October or, of course, they can be appointed. The Senate advertises for the Senate positions and students are encouraged to apply.

A 2.0 GPA and a five-minute speech in front of the Senate are the two requirements needed.
