In the September 27, 1973, The Yell several UNLV athletes were reportedly arrested by drug agents. When they were brought to court, they were classified as juveniles (which is legally under 18 years). All of the 20-year-old athletes were automatically guaranteed sealed records by the ruling. UNLV revoked the scholarships of those athletes arrested.

Nevada grads want to stay home

BY TONYA LOME

Even though UNLV is an up-and-coming university and University of Nevada, Reno is considered established, graduates of either have a pretty equal chance for out-of-state employment.

"About 70 percent of companies recruiting on-campus are looking for students willing to relocate," said Eileen McGarry, director of Career Planning and Placing at UNLV. Some of the other companies want students to be flexible to possible relocation in the future.

The problem, McGarry said, is many students want to stay in Nevada and in the Las Vegas area. Those that do decide to relocate usually stay in the southwest region, she added.

This also seems to be the sentiment of graduates of UNR, according to Colette Dollarhide, director of Career Development at UNR. Dollarhide said "a good 80 to 90 percent (of graduates) want to stay in Reno."

For UNR graduates relocating, the areas targeted are Sacramento, San Francisco and Seattle, Dollarhide said. "A smaller number go south to Las Vegas, Los Angeles, or Phoenix."

McGarry explained there is not a lack of opportunity for UNLV graduates, but there is a problem with "limits students put on themselves."

UNLV's status as a young university also does not seem to be an obstacle in getting companies on campus to recruit, McGarry explained. There have been times she has to inform certain companies about programs offered at the university, she admitted.

Some programs are stronger than others and will have more out-of-state recruiting possibilities, McGarry said.

For UNLV, the hotel college has the highest number of out-of-state recruitment. That is because, McGarry said, not many hotels in Las Vegas offer a management training programs like what is offered in the bigger hotel chains.

For UNR, top recruitment comes in the engineering field, according to Dollarhide.

McGarry also believes that "UNLV is stronger in the number of companies it attracts" compared to UNR, but the programs are also different at the two universities.

More often than not whether a student gets hired "is a balance between the degree and who you are as a person," McGarry said.

Kostman claims victory for university students

This is what part of the faculty membership of the Intercollegiate Athletic Council (IAC) attempted to tell the 40 students in attendance at yesterday's meeting.

One main area the IAC's are involved in includes, setting eligibility requirements for the admission of student athletes, among their many other duties.

Currently, the committee consists of five faculty members, three students, and one alumni representative.

The members, Len Zane (Director of the Honors Program), Fred Bachhuber (Professor of Geology), and James Cardel (Associate professor of Engineering) planned to change the current setup to six faculty members (the newest one being from the Faculty Senate) and reducing the student membership to two.

The final vote on the issue was 5-3, in favor of the students.

Along with Student Body President Joel Kostman, other student representatives John Pida, and Patrick Smith voted to keep the committee the way it presently stands.

The two faculty representatives who voted along with the students rights were Dr. James Kitchen, associate dean of students, and Rebecca Mills, assistant professor in the College of Education.

Had the amendment passed, along with the loss of the seat, one of the student seats would have been occupied by a student-athlete, an arrangement some construed as a conflict of interest.

Bachhuber, the chair of the committee said, "I strongly and honestly believe that student representation is disproportionately high."

In Kostman's speech to the committee he said, "at present, there are nearly 20,000 student's attending UNLV. With only three student representatives on the IAC, that's only one for every 6,700 students."

"With approximately 670 faculty members on this campus, the five votes owned by the faculty represent only 134 constituents each. Disproportionate Mr. Chairman, I would say so."

Kostman added, that he was insulted when Zane inferred that students would make a vote for some other purpose than just being on this committee, for example, because they wanted to see a UNLV team win, or because they wanted to see a particular athlete play.

He mentioned that through student fees, $1 million per year has been generated for athletics.

Addressing the committee, Kostman asked, "how can you possibly tell students that our vote is not as important as your vote?"

"The university's here for us (the students), and without us, there would be no university."
