staff, those who sauté, grill and prepare the meals.

"We teach the management aspects of the job, not how to be a waiter," Azizoltani stressed. "To be a hotel or food and beverage manager, one must have certain skills."

While Azizoltani is responsible for the front of the house operations, Chef Jean Hertzman handles the back. "The student managers have to come up with the recipe," the chef stated. "Then we bring it back to the kitchen to test it—see what adjustments need to be made. It is imperative to the learning experience."

Hotel major Todd Huggins feels the program is very good. "It teaches you everything," said the senior, who plans to go into private club management. "It's a valuable experience for anyone who wants to be part of any food and beverage situation." He had already served his time in the production end and was taking his turn with the front of the house duties.

James Korona, another senior in the program agreed with Huggins. "You look at things differently; the way things flow, in general, can be critical." He also indicated that it was a lot more work than he imagined. "There is more depth to the process, and I have more respect than I previously did." Korona also added that the key to success was marketing your product. "Even people in the hotel school don't know about this program."

The grill's regular menu features appetizers like Spinach and Artichoke Dip for $2.95, Thai Chicken Salad for $4.75, a Garden Burger with curly fries, roasted new potatoes or veggies for $4.95 or Linguine Primavera at $4.75. Desert, coffee, soft drinks and spirits are also available at a nominal cost.

In addition to the regular menu, and the guest restaurant venture, the grill also features theme weeks, exploring many ethnic and exotic selections.

Lunch is served Tuesday and Thursday, 11:30 a.m. to 2 p.m., while Wednesday's dinner is served from 5:30 p.m. to 10 p.m. Reservations are accepted for parties of eight or more.
