Jewish Groups Split On Education Issue

WASHINGTON, (JTA) -- Jewish organizations split in taking stands on President Johnson's proposed federal aid to education, joining with other organizations in raising the church-state issue he had tried to avoid.

Two Orthodox Jewish groups, Agudath Israel of America and the National Society for Hebrew Day Schools, supported the Administration multi-million dollar school aid bill. This was expected, since both groups have consistently argued that the constitutional issue should not bar help to hard-pressed religiously-sponsored schools. The current bill seeks to skirt the issue by providing aid to children in low income families, rather than to schools, and by providing $100,000,000.00 to help build "shared time" teaching facilities for both public and religious school pupils.

Rabbi Morris Sherer of the Agudath Israel contended before the Senate Subcommittee on Education, that the issue was educational, not religious. He added that his organization was "especially gratified" that the bill did not "arbitrarily" ignore the educational needs of pupils in religiously oriented elementary and secondary schools.

Harold Goldin, testifying for the American Jewish Congress, asserted that federal aid to parochial schools would have a "disastrous effect" on American education.

The American Jewish Committee came out for the bill, subject to some qualifications, particularly inclusion of a provision for judicial review. Morris B. Abram, the AJ Committee president, appeared before the House Subcommittee on Education to declare that the AJ Committee's primary concern was centered on the "child benefit aspects" of the new bill. He said that "as long as the state or federal government does not aid religion or religious education or church-related institutions; so long as its grant-of-aid is extended to the protection and improvement of the welfare of the child, it is irrelevant that the assistance goes to a person who happens to be of any one race, creed or ethnic origin."
