Freedom Ring, an extremist propagand's operation using telephone automatic announcement service, was again cited as the principal offender.

Following a League complaint filed with the FCC on September 3, the American Telephone and Telegraph Company announced that names and addresses of subscribers to the announcement service would be given out on request in order to "facilitate recourse to the courts by those who considered themselves defamed."

The League said the telephone company is in the same position as a telegraph company when it has been made aware of the libelous content of a message it transmits. It it thereafter permits the repeated transmission of the message, it should be held responsible, according to the League.
