H-BOMB HARNESS AT UNLV

LAS VEGAS, Nev. -- A highly promising new proposal to harness the immense powers of the hydrogen bomb for peaceful uses has been devised by a professor of physics at the University of Nevada, Las Vegas.

Dr. Friedwardt Winterberg, 40, has formulated a method of controlling thermonuclear reactions which may solve all the energy needs of mankind once and for all.

If the physicist's theory holds true -- and it will be tested soon -- it will at last provide an solution to the taming of the hydrogen atom which has stymied scientists both in the U. S. and the Soviet Union for two decades.

Winterberg, the director of the Laboratory for Space Research at the University System's Desert Research Institute, already has revealed his calculations in scientific circles where he has achieved enthusiastic endorsement from nuclear experts throughout the world.

Dr. Edward Teller, pioneer nuclear physicist recognized as the "father of the hydrogen bomb," has obtained a first hand account of the proposal and supports it strongly, Winterberg stated.

Rep. E. Q. Daddario, chairman of the House subcommittee on science and astronautics, said Winterberg's theory is "considered to be the most likely method susceptible to experimental success."

Within the near future, Winterberg will meet with U. S. rocket expert Dr. Werner von Braun to discuss the theory's applications to advanced propulsion systems and inter-planetary space travel.

TALKS RESUMED

WASHINGTON (WNS) --- American officials have acknowledged that talks with the Soviet Union on the Mideast situation were back "on dead center" and said that Russian unwillingness to play an "actively constructive role" was the reason.

The officials said that Moscow seemed to feel it cannot take a position too different from the stance advanced by the Arab Governments. At the same time, Washington is resisting efforts by England and France to have the Big Four resume their United Nations discussions on the Mideast. The United States is apprehensive over London and Paris joining Moscow in a united effort to pressure Washington into making more swelling concessions toward the Arab side in the crisis.
