 at the Rabat conference).
 The Israelis said that Nasser went to Rabat with four objectives and failed to gain any of them. They were: the reassertion of Egyptian hegemony in the Arab world; support for the Palestinian terrorists from all Arab states; increased financial support from the oil-producing Arab states for Egypt's war effort and an all-Arab plan for a new war against Israel.

According to reports from Rabat, a row flared after Col. Nasser called on the Arab heads of state to pledge definite cash contributions to the Egyptian war plan. The issue apparently touched off the long-standing resentment between the conservative Arab states represented by oil rich Saudi Arabia and Kuwait and the Socialist oriented "progressive" states. King Faisal of Saudi Arabia challenged Nasser to account for how he spent the money provided by Saudi Arabia since 1967. At that point, Col. Nasser stormed out of the meeting.

Nine of the Arab countries reportedly supported Nasser's war plan. Four wanted to study it further and Kuwait was neutral. Nasser told the conference that Egypt was bearing the brunt of attacks by Israel and demanded that each Arab nation spell out what it was prepared to commit to the struggle. He reportedly quarreled with King Hussein of Jordan, who expressed a liking for the new American initiative which allegedly would return virtually the entire West Bank to Jordan and give Jordan a role in governing Jerusalem. The Syrian, Iraqi and Yemeni delegations boycotted the ceremonial closing session which was intended to put the best possible face on the abortive summit. Nasser departed for Tripoli for talks with the Libya's leftist military junta on coordinated military, economic and social efforts. Yasser Arafat, the head of El Fatah and of the Palestine Liberation Organization that coordinates all guerrilla groups, told newsmen afterwards that all she got out of the Rabat conference was "love and sympathy."
