 directed by an experienced young Arab social service graduate, one of whose goals is "to teach brotherhood and the love of mankind."

The ulpan, or intensive language school, conducted by Mother Aline, Mother Superior of a convent on the Via Dolorosa, in East Jerusalem within the ancient walls. This school, which teaches Hebrew to Arabs, Arabic to Israelis, and both languages to foreign Christians, has been attended by more than 1,000 students in the past three years.

A Haifa University sensitivity training workshop, which recently brought together Arab and Israeli students for a three-day pilot project. "Slowly but measurably," Mr. Band explained, "the participants began to appear to each other not as students and Arabs or Israelis but as people."

The increasing use by Arabs of the American Jewish Committee's specialized reading and research library in Jerusalem, which is open to scholars of all nationalities. In recently enlarged quarters at 9 Ethiopia Street, the library contains hundreds of reference and research works as well as more than 150 journals and periodicals, both scholarly and popular. The library subscribes to all daily newspapers in Israel and maintains a clipping file. A full-time librarian is on hand six days a week.

A research program seeking to measure changes in attitudes of Arabs and Israelis toward each others' culture. Among other activities in this area, the Committee publishes, twice a month translations of articles, editorials, letters to the editor and other appropriate material that appears in the Arab press. It also has conducted, in co-operation with the Hebrew University's Department of Psychology, a training program for government and other officials so that they may better serve and more effectively understand the culture, value system, Arab constituencies, and life style of their
