rest of 1971 in ineffective debate or inflammatory resolutions."

Referring to Egyptian President Anwar Sadat's recent threat that he "would sacrifice a million men to achieve a military victory," Eban said "What he and we should be considering is how to ensure the 33 million Egyptians, that the 3 million Israelis and the other millions in the Middle East be saved from sacrifice and preserved for the construction of a peaceful regional order."

He contended the first road to peace lies in a Canal pact as in "disengagement, there is an urgent international interest." Eban said "when agreement on a final (Canal) boundary is reached Israeli forces will withdraw to it." He added that Israel would return to the Jarring talks "if Egypt will present its position for negotiations without the unprecedented request for Israel's acceptance (of Egyptian terms) in advance of negotiations." Eban also stated that Israel had "never asserted that in a condition of peace it would be necessary for our troops to remain in all of Sinai or even in most of it." But he noted the need for a "contractual basis for a continued (Israeli) presence in order to safeguard security and navigation.

Eban also called for an international conference "to chart a five year plan for the solution of the refugee problem and the integration of refugees into productive life," and said that "it might be profitable to attempt to draft some of the clauses of the Egyptian-Israeli treaty relating to the principles of peace."

The Egyptian Ambassador to the UN Mohammed H. el-

Zayyat was not present during Eban's speech.
