RUSSIAN JEWISH ACTIVISTS GET VISAS

NEW YORK (WNS) -- Five leading Jewish activists in the Soviet Union have been given permission to leave.

According to American organizations for Soviet Jewry visas have been granted to Boris Einbinder, Vladimir Roginsky, Vladimir Mash, and Boris Orlov, all of Moscow, and Igor Goldfarb, of Kiev.

Meanwhile, more than 80 other Soviet Jews have protested to the Soviet Communist Party Central Committee over denials of visas to them and others. Their petition, made available to Western newsmen, said the applicants did not belong to "any of the categories" named by Communist Party Central Committee over denials of visas to them and others. Their petition, made available to Western newsmen, said the applicants did not belong to "any of the categories" named by Communist Party Secretary Leonid I. Brezhnev during his visit to the U.S. last June.

Among the signers were the eminent scientist Prof. Benjamin Levich, computer specialist Aleksander Lerner, and Vladimir Slepak. Levich has been denied permission by Soviet authorities to attend a meeting of the American Electro-Chemical Society in Boston where he was to receive its 1973 Palladium Award as well as address the conference.

In another development, the National Conference on Soviet Jewry reported that it has learned that ballet dancer Valery Panov has received permission to emigrate to Israel if he leaves his wife, Galina. Galina, who is not Jewish, was denied a visa because her father refused to let her emigrate. Panov reportedly told Soviet officials that "I prefer to die rather than leave her."

meanwhile, Prof. Moise Gitterman, an expert in solid state physics, has arrived in Israel from the Soviet Union with his family. The 42-year old scientist was one of six Jewish scientists who staged a hunger strike in Moscow to protest the denial of exit visas.
