U.N. RESOLUTION

Security Council resolution 242 and the start of negotiations "under appropriate auspices aimed at establishing a just and durable peace."

Israel and Egypt accepted the ceasefire but during the next 24 hours there was fierce fighting on both banks of the Suez Canal with Israel claiming to have greatly improved its position on the west bank of the canal. Syria did not accept the ceasefire and Israel reported its naval and air units inflicted heavy damage on Syria's oil network.

Meanwhile the main brunt of the fighting that continued after the ceasefire involved Israel's encirclement of the Egyptian Third Corps a force of some 20,000 men and 200 tanks, on the west bank. Israel had control of areas in the west bank of major strategic importance containing oil refineries, railway lines and junctions, power stations and army camps.

The Security Council then adopted a second resolution calling on both sides to return "to the positions occupied at the moment the (original) ceasefire went into effect." The resolution also instructed Secretary General Kurt Waldheim to immediately send UN truce observers to supervise the ceasefire. Forty-three additional observers are being sent to the Mideast in addition to the 280 already there.

The second ceasefire was also accepted by Syria. But after it went into effect an Israeli Army spokesman said the Egyptian Third Corps was continuing hostilities in an attempt to break out of the Israeli encirclement. Later the battlefronts were quiet except for the occasional salvos of artillery fire.

Israel has agreed to a Red Cross request to supply blood plasma to the Third Army. An Israeli army spokesman said that the Third Corps is probably not in good shape although he was convinced they have enough water and food to last for some time. However, he said it had lost its power as an operational unit.

Later Waldheim announced that some 900 troops from the UN peace-keepers force in Cyprus would be transferred as an advance party of the Mideast Force.
