NO MORE DISENGAGEMENT TALKS

JERUSALEM (WNS) -- Premier Yitzhak Rabin has stressed that there will be "no more disengagement agreements."

He told some 2000 members of Nahal, the semi-agricultural, semi-military unit, that the next step in Middle East peace talks must be "progress toward significant peace agreements."

Rabin said he could not rule out war, but if it comes it will be "only because our peaceful intentions were not met by our neighbors."

Israeli sources interpreted Rabin's speech as a clear message to the United States that Israel does not agree to the joint communique issued by President Ford and King Hussein of Jordan at the conclusion of Hussein's visit to Washington in which the U. S. and Jordan agreed to seek talks for an Israeli-Jordanian disengagement agreement.

Israel has not agreed to disengagement talks with Jordan prior to either an overall Middle East settlement or

We've Got Choices

We're down to the nitty gritty on what undoubtedly is the most hectic and confused primary election in Nevada or anywhere.

So many candidates have filed for so many to continued negotiations with Egypt and Syria.

Meanwhile Israel was caught by surprise by the Hussein-Ford statement. Foreign Minister Yigal Allon left Washington convinced that Secretary of State Henry A. Kissinger could dissuade Hussein from the disengagement idea.

At the same time Israeli sources see the communique as not aimed against Israel but at bolstering Hussein's position in the Arab world. The Israeli government was also miffed at Kissinger for announcing at a press conference that Rabin will visit Washington in the first half of September without first having received Rabin's reply to the proposed date.

At the press conference, Kissinger said there would be little chance that he would engage again in "shuttle diplomacy" posts, it is virtually impossible for even a careful observer to know the qualifications of each hopeful. Campaign contributions have been scarce for the primary, which made it more difficult for those who filed to propagandize their backgrounds, especially in state-wide and county-wide contests. In district races, the contestants, for the most part, have relied on knocking on doors.

Before we tell you who we prefer at the polls, and why, we call attention to the sad state of voter interest in this most important election year. We don't know the reason, be it Watergate, Nixon's resignation, inflation or the decline of the stock market, but voters in primaries held so far, are staying away from the polls in droves. Don't let this happen in Nevada. Please, please, get out and assert yourself. Don't be complacent. If your mind has not been made up by September 3, perhaps you may receive some encouragement from what we have to say about our favorites in some key races.
