

RUSSIA REJECTS IMMIGRATION DEAL SAYS KISSINGER WITHHELD DECISION

The Russian Kremlin has rejected a deal to allow emigration of more Soviet Jews in exchange for trade benefits with the United States and accused Secretary of State Henry Kissinger of covering up the decision.

The official Tass news agency said Washington had violated 1972 summit agreements to life trade barriers unconditionally.

"Tass is authorized to state that flatly rejected as unacceptable in leading circles in the Soviet Union are any attempts, from whomever they may come, to interfere in internal affairs that are entirely the concern of the Soviet state and no one else," the statement said.

Tass said the rejection applied to "the attempts to include in the (trade) bills provisions concerning, for instance, the departure of Soviet citizens for other countries."

Initial foreign reaction in Moscow to the Soviet statement was low-keyed. Some Western diplomats said the Soviet may be trying to project a hardline stand at home while still planning to adhere to the deal.

The two houses of the U.S. Congress last week separately adopted bills granting the Soviets most-favored-nation trade status in exchange for a sharp increase in emigration.

The trade bill must still be passed by a joint House-Senate committee before going to President Ford for signature.

In addition to the rejection, Tass carried a letter from Foreign Minister Andrei Gromyko that it said was handed to Kissinger October 26 when Kissinger was in the Soviet capital in advance of Ford's visit there last month.

Gromyko said that reports, including letters written by Kissinger himself, gave a "distorted picture" of the Kremlin's stand on emigration.

Gromyko told Kissinger "the question as such is entirely within the internal competence of our state."

Jewish sources estimate 300,000 Jews would leave the Soviet Union if unrestricted emigration were allowed.
