Charles A. Vanik (D. Ohio), issued a joint statement saying that the Soviet repudiation was "a disappointing development," but "we in Congress remain committed to the view that a broadening of trade relations must be accompanied by progress in the area of human rights. We shall not diminish our efforts to help those who seek freedom."

Sen. Clifford E. Case (R. N.J.) said the Soviet action reflected a struggle for control within the Soviet leadership and was not related to any U.S. action. This was a view shared by some other Senators and Simon Wiesenthal, head of the Jewish Documentation Center in Vienna, who said there were "strong forces within the Soviet leadership opposed to the detente policy of Soviet Communist Party head Leonid I. Brezhnev."

He also suggested that Arab pressure and Soviet efforts to regain positions the USSR previously held in the Middle East might also have induced the Soviet Union to cancel the agreement. President Ford seemed to be putting the blame on Congress when he said in his State of the Union message that Congress should refrain from putting legislative restrictions on the President's conduct of foreign policy. "Legislative restrictions intended for the best motives and purposes can have the opposite result as we have seen most recently with the Soviet Union," Ford said.

In New York, leaders of the Conference of Presidents of Major American Jewish Organizations and the National Conference on Soviet Jewry expressed regret over the Soviet action and said it was probably due to the limit on the amount of credit the Export-Import Bank could give the USSR as well as political considerations within the Soviet Union.

Israeli Foreign Minister Yigal Allon who was in Washington said he did not see why Jewish emigration from the Soviet Union should be affected by the Russian action since there was emigration before the trade agreement.

In Israel, the World Zionist Organization, the Absorption Ministry and Information Minister Aharon Yariv pledged to continue efforts to help Soviet Jews emigrate.

LAS VEGAS ISRAELITE
REVERSE ARAB OIL EMBARGO

NEW YORK (WUP). -- Lane Kirkland, Secretary-Treasurer of the AFL-CIO, in countering the "continual threat of an embargo as a form of blackmail" by the Arab states, has suggested that the U.S. "reverse the embargo...on all Arab oil, on all oil from any country that enforced an embargo against us."

Interviewed earlier this month by Paul Duke on the weekly NPACT program "Washington Straight Talk," the noted labor leader was emphatic in expressing his personal view with regards to the oil blackmail threat imposed by the oil-producing states. "I would, in the first instance," he told Mr. Duke, "reverse the embargo."

"You mean, just not import any oil from the Arab countries?" Duke asked. "Precisely," Kirkland replied. "It would rid us of this threat of embargo," he told Duke. "It would reverse it. It would of course overcome our deficit in our balance of payments, which is working very

Your electric bill reflects your personal way of life.

No two electric bills are ever alike.

Not even when you compare electric bills from homes about the same size with the same number of appliances.

Because it's not what you own, it's how you use what you own that counts.

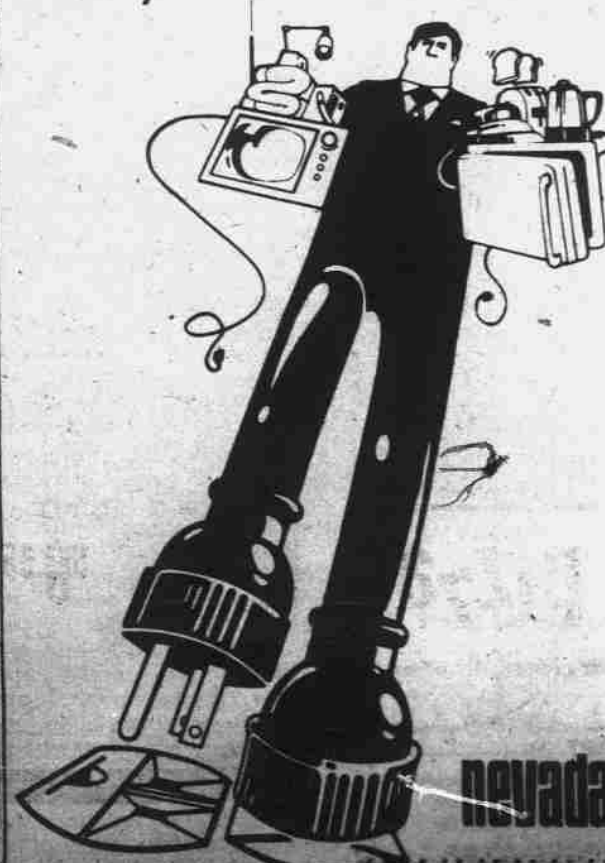

So here are several, important ways you can lower your electric bill and conserve energy:

- Most important, make sure your home is properly insulated.
- Keep your thermostat a steady 68.
- Use only full loads in dishwashers, washers and dryers.
- Use your small appliances to prepare meals whenever possible.
- Turn off lights and appliances when you're finished with them.

- Repair leaky faucets.
- Open up those drapes and let the sun help heat your home.
- Keep all appliances in top working order.

These are only a few of the many ways that you can conserve electric energy in your home.

Providing you with that energy is our business but using it wisely is everyone's business.
