

YOUNG SOVIET JEWS CLOSER TO JUDAISM

NEW YORK -- Young Jews in the Soviet Union are "drawing closer to religious life," Rabbi Jacob Fishman, the Chief Rabbi of Moscow declared here. Rabbi Fishman, who officiates at Moscow's Central Synagogue, came to the United States as part of a delegation of nine Soviet clergymen here for a 10-day visit under the auspices of the Appeal of Conscience Foundation. The Rabbi said there are three synagogues in Moscow which hold daily services as well as "prayer rooms" around the city. The only other Jew in the delegation was Adolf Shayovich, a former engineer who is now studying at the Rabbinical Seminary in Budapest, Hungary.

He said there is an "intensified" interest in Judaism among young Jews.

In a statement issued after the delegation's arrival, Stanley Lowell, chairman of the National Conference on Soviet Jewry, attacked Fishman and the other clergymen as "fluctuaries" of the Soviet government. He said the Moscow rabbi has opposed Jewish emigration and has been silent about the denial of religious and cultural freedom for Soviet Jews, about Soviet anti-Semitism and about the harassment of Jews.

Youngsters from ages 7 to 15 will enjoy a summer of fun activities including kayaking, canoeing, scuba diving, swimming and many more in a special summer program beginning June 14 at UNLV.
