

ANDREW YOUNG SUGGESTS LINK WITH PLO

WASH. (WNS) -- Andrew Young, the United States Ambassador to the United Nations, has suggested that the U.S. establish a link with the Palestine Liberation Organization although he stopped short of advocating recognition.

In an interview with Interdependent, the publication of the United Nations Association of the United States, Young said that the Palestinians do not feel that the Camp David agreements assure them of self-determination and a link with the PLO might solve that problem. "That's what we are working on," he said.

But the State Department said Jan. 17 that the U.S. has not changed its policies toward the PLO and its only contacts with the terrorist organization is in New York City where they "are incidental and related to our responsibilities as host country to the UN."

State Department spokesman Hodding

Carter added that the Camp David accords "envisage" including the Palestinians in the peace process and the U.S. has tried to "engage Palestinians in the process." Carter stressed that Young's views are "personal observations" and that the UN Ambassador "understands and supports our policy regarding the PLO."

In the interview, Young said the basic reason that the U.S. has not established a link with the PLO is Israeli opposition. "I don't necessarily quarrel with that," he said, "because I think that Israel is going to have to make the decisions about how it's going to relate to the Palestinian people." But, he asserted that despite Israel's opposition, the U.S. should have some way of relating to the Palestinian people." He said Washington is "working on" this, but hasn't "reached a conclusion."

WASHINGTON -- B'nai B'rith has called on President Carter to disassociate himself from remarks of United Nations Ambassador Andrew Young suggesting that it might be realistic for the United States to recognize the Palestine Liberation Organization.
