

CONCERN RAISED ABOUT JEWISH INFLUENCE

she is suggesting that there is anti-Semitism at the UN, Kirkpatrick replied: "I just said that Israel was a pariah nation at the United Nations and that there has been some concern expressed about Jewish influence within our mission."

Kirkpatrick sharply criticized the United Nations, accusing it of double standards in its actions. "The United Nations, very frequently, very very frequently acts on the basis of double standards, rather than even-handedly," she said. "That it applies to those nations who it desires to make targets or scapegoats very different standards, and judges them by them. Israel is one, South Africa is one, the non-Communist nations of Latin America are other examples." Kirkpatrick was asked by Wallace if the UN should exist in view of all the criticism against it. She said: "Well, the UN does exist.

You know like death and taxes, the UN exists." She also noted that a great deal of invectives are used at the UN. "Dirty names, Name calling, racist, imperialist, Zionist, you know, that sort of thing.

The program also interviewed the former

Argentine publisher and journalist Jacobo Timerman. Timerman, author of the book, "Prisoner Without a Name, Cell Without a Number," charged that if Kirkpatrick's human rights policy had been U.S. policy while he was in an Argentine prison he would still be in the prison, "no question about that," he said.

On that charge, Kirkpatrick replied: "I think Jacobo Timerman comes dangerously close to the non-democratic left in Argentina, And I'm afraid that I think that he isn't careful enough to not associate himself with the non-democratic left. And while I have absolute sympathy with his suffering . . . and I feel total solidarity with his problem there, and would have done anything I could have, either as a private person or as a government official, to alleviate that, I don't agree with the political uses to which he has put the human rights cause since he's been out."
