

Kissinger: Now Is Bad Time To Seek Comprehensive Middle East Peace

TORONTO (WNS) — Former Secretary of State Henry Kissinger said that he did not believe there is an opportunity at this time to make a breakthrough toward peace in the Middle East and warned that "any attempt to achieve a comprehensive solution at this moment will lead to an extraordinarily difficult and dangerous situation. He also emphasized that involving the Soviet Union in any Middle East negotiations would make the effort to achieve peace "infinitely more difficult." The basic reason for this skepticism about the possibility for a breakthrough is the continuing internecine warfare between the Arab states, the domestic turmoil within the Arab states, and the fear on the part of some Arab leaders that making peace with Israel would undermine their continued existence.

Addressing the closing plenary of the 53rd General Assembly of the Council of Jewish Federations, he told the more than 2,000 delegates that "simple limited arrangements that can ease the situation should be pursued." He indicated that this should include some form of autonomy arrangement as called for in the Camp David accords. He also noted one successful limited agreement as the one between Israel and Syria on the Golan Heights.

Continuing, Kissinger said that the U.S. "has learned that attempting too sweeping an approach can lead to setbacks and even humiliation and may achieve nothing substantial." While he did not elaborate on this theme, some observers viewed this as an implicit criticism of President Reagan's 1982 Mideast initiative and the eventual withdrawal of the U.S. forces from Beirut.
