Tailpipe inspections in Clark and Washoe Counties will be more stringent in 1986.

Vehicles will have to pass an annual inspection that significantly cuts exhaust rates of carbon monoxide. Carbon monoxide levels allowed in exhaust will drop from 3 percent to 1.5 percent.

The new standard was adopted by the Nevada State Environmental Commission in August 1985 to improve air quality in both Clark and Washoe Counties.

Michael Naylor, Clark County Health District air pollution control director, says that cars receiving regular maintenance will likely pass the new test. Those not properly maintained, or cars misfueled with leaded gasoline may not.

"We calculate that less than 7 percent of the vehicles in Clark County fail the current tailpipe inspection," Naylor notes. "With the new changes, the failure rate could go to 14 percent."

Naylor offers this advice to Clark County motorists: "If you have been tempted to put lower-priced leaded gasoline into a car designed for unleaded gasoline, please refrain. Using the proper gasoline for your car will make it easy to pass the test. If you have misfueled your engine, start saving money now for repairs."

Motorists who have misfueled their cars may have to replace the engine's catalytic converter.
