

Holocaust Memorial Museum To Be Built In New York

NEW YORK (WNS) — A museum that will serve as a memorial to the Holocaust and to the Jewish culture that was destroyed by Nazism is to be erected in Battery Park City here.

Survivors of the Holocaust joined with Governor Mario Cuomo and Mayor Edward Koch and the co-chairmen of the New York Holocaust Memorial Commission —

George Klein, Robert Morgenthau, Manhattan District Attorney, and N.Y. State Senate Majority leader Manfred Ohrenstein — in signing a 99-year lease for the land on which the Museum of Jewish Heritage - A Living Memorial to the Holocaust will be built.

At the dramatic ceremony, Elie Wiesel, chairman of the U.S.

Holocaust Memorial Council, said: "Only those who were there will know what it meant to be there. And yet we must communicate that knowledge any way we can through the language of memory. May this museum become a vehicle for that language."

Jewish leaders, city officials and Israeli diplomats also attended the lease-signing ceremony in full view of the Statue of Liberty.

The museum, which will cost an estimated $60 million to construct, will be built by the New York Holocaust Commission. Cuomo said that "The Holocaust Museum will bring to New Yorkers and citizens of the world who visit the city a solemn reminder of the horrible crime committed against the Jewish community, a crime against all humanity. Mayor Koch said that the Museum will serve as a tribute to the collective memory of Jews, "a memory that spans the ages and enables us to resist as we always will the efforts of any barbarians to destroy us." The museum, designed by architect James Stewart Polshek, will be built in conjunction with a 34-story residential tower, which will help finance the project. Ground-breaking is anticipated in the spring of 1987, with an opening projected for 1989.
