Ancient Christian City Excavated In Negev

JERUSALEM (WNS) — A Christian city that flourished in Israel's Negev some 1,500 to 2,000 years ago is now revealing its glory in Israel's Negev desert as the result of excavations carried out by a team from the Hebrew University's Institute of Archaeology and the University of Maryland.

Directing the recently completed fifth season of excavations at the site were Prof. Yoram Tsafrir of the Hebrew University and Prof. Kenneth Holum of the University of Maryland, who headed teams of archaeologists from both universities. Funds for the digs were provided by the Dumbarton Oaks Center for Byzantine Studies and the National Center for Constitutional Studies, both of Washington, D.C.

The city, known as Rehovot in the Negev, is located some 35 kilometers southwest of Beersheba in the midst of barren desert hills. Once an important point on the Sinai-Palestine-Syria route, the town was built in the first century B.C.E. as a way station by the Nabateans, a now-extinct desert-dwelling people who conducted trade in incense and spices between Arabia and the Mediterranean region and also conducted a flourishing agriculture, even in near totally arid regions.

It was during the early Christian era -- the fifth to seventh centuries C.E. -- that the city reached its zenith. It is believed that the population there at one time may have been about 4,000-5,000 people, making it the second largest community of its time in the Negev, after nearby Halutza.
