Japanese Rabbi Urges Steps To Combat Anti-Semitism There

WASHINGTON (JTA) — American Jews should construct a Jewish cultural center in Tokyo to disseminate information that would counter negative Japanese perceptions of Jews, Japan's sole rabbi urged here last week.

Michael Schudrick, spiritual leader of the Jewish Community Center in Tokyo, explained that the stereotypes were essentially the result of a recent spate of anti-Semitic books. He delivered his comments following a conference on that literature sponsored by the American Jewish Committee.

Approximately 170 Jewish families live in Tokyo and no more than 1,000 Jews are in Japan at any given time, the rabbi estimated. The Japanese government and people are not anti-Semitic, he said, and "no significant acts" of anti-Semitism have taken place in Japan in recent years.

The problem, as he saw it, was that some "very unscrupulous authors" were "taking advantages of" the Japanese public with the anti-Semitic books.

Theodore Ellenoff, AJCommittee President, said that two officials from the Japanese Embassy in Washington attended portions of the conference. He said one of the political counselors told the group the phenomenon of anti-Semitic literature in Japan was short-lived.

David Goodman, professor of Japanese comparative literature at the University of Illinois, Champaign-Urbana, told the conference that roots of these books may be concern over Japan's international stature, including economic and political ties with other countries.

He said the literature "is not related to Israel" and is intended
