

$80,000 Sought To Save Golda's Denver Duplex

DENVER (JTA) — Two local organizations report some success in their effort to raise $80,000 this month from individual donors here to fund the rescue and restoration of the home of the late Golda Meir.

The Golda Meir Memorial Association and the Auraria Higher Education Center are trying to quickly raise half of the estimated $160,000 needed to save and utilize Meir's former home here, according to Larry Ambrose, development director of the education center.

If successful, the education center likely will go ahead with its plan to include the home — a vacant and dilapidated duplex in which Meir lived briefly 70 years ago — in the historic park at its campus.

Ambrose said local Jews and non-Jews are being asked to contribute. The organized Jewish community has not offered funds, claiming it has more pressing needs.

Auraria and the Meir association struck a deal last October with the City of Denver, which had sought to raze the house based on city reports that it was structurally unsound and posed a danger to children who were sneaking into it at its present site, a municipal park.

Under the agreement, the city can demolish the structure by March 30 if Auraria decides this month not to move the house. If Auraria decides to move the house, it has until June.

An ad hoc committee of local historians, public affairs specialist and authors has advised Auraria that Meir's home has historical importance because the former Israeli premier often credited her time in Denver, 1913-14, as being formative in the development of her Zionism.

The house also may be the last standing structure in the United States in which she lived.
