Day of Glory Ended

Palace at Avignon, Once Home of the Popes, Now Scene of Vanished Splendor

(Special Correspondence.)

At Avignon, in the south of France, may still be seen the palace in which the popes lived and ruled during what Petrarch called the "shameful exile of the church of Jesus Christ," and other writers have named "the Babylonish captivity," in the fourteenth century. Although defaced and occupied as a barracks, the palace retains its chief architectural features, and is one of the most massive and most nearly perfect specimens of fourteenth century military architecture in existence to-day.

Those were troubleus days in which the papal court was established on the soil of Provence, and the patace was begun on a scale to insure great strength. It was further strengthened as construction went on, until it was like a fortress, protected from within and without by every device then employed for such a purpose. Here ruled | the papal glory there, and the palace ble throne used by the popes. Here also is the tomb of Pope John XII, who is remembered for having left a treasure of 18,000,000 gold florins, and 7,000,000 in plate and jewels.

Romance in Early History.

Romance invests the memories of the foundation and early history of the papal palace. Avignon was first ceded to the popes in 1273, and sovereignty over it is said to have been sold to Clement V by Joanna, the girl queen of Naples and Provence, in 1346, for 80,000 gold florins (which were said never to have been paid), in consideration for a dispensation permitting her to marry the man of her heart, Prince Louis de Tarentum, her first husband, having been murdered.

Petrarch was a guest and Rienzi a prisoner at Avignon at the height of the popes, Daudet, in his "Letters from My Mill," thus describes the life of

"Whoso did not see Avignon in the days of the popes has seen nothing. For gayety, life, Animation, the excitement of festivals, never was a town like it. From morning till night | court back to Rome in 1408. After there was nothing but processions, pilgrimages, streets strewn with flowers, draped with tapestries, cardinals ar- legate, until the French revolution, riving by the Rhone, panners waving when the city was reunited with in the breeze, galleys dressed in flags, the pope's soldiers chanting Latin on all right to it forever. the squares, and the titkling rattle of the begging friars; while from garret to cellar of houses that pressed, humming, round the great capal palace like bees around their hive, came the tack-tack of lace looms, the to-and-fro of shuttles weaving the gold thread of chasubles, the tap-tap of the goldsmith's chasing tools on the chalices. the tuning of choir instruments at the lutemakers', the song of the spinners at their work; and above all this rose the sound of bells, and always the echo of certain tambourines coming from away down there on the bridge of Avignon; because, with us, when the people are happy they must dance, they must dance and in those days the streets were too narrow for the farandole, and fifes and tambourines posted themselves on the bridge of Avignon, in the fresh breeze from the Rhone, and day and night the folks danced, they danced. Ah, the happy times! the happy town! Halberds that did not wound, prisons where the wine was put to cool; no hunger, no war. That's how the popes of the Comtat governed their people, and that's why their people so deeply regretted

Only the grim old castle, and the djoining church containing tombs of Ancient Palace of the Popes. many cardinals and archbishops, and two popes, remain as reminders of the papal reign in Avignon. The old halls of the palace have been cut up into small spartments, and the original arrangement of its interior is only suggested. In two small remaining is are a few frescoes, and those are all that are left of its once beautiful decorations. The remains of the m are seen, where, profune hisory states, heretics were roasted in Block 4. Las Vegas, Nevade adjoining cathedral is the simple mar-near. Trains of warriors, princes with Writing of Avignon in the time of their gorgeous following, churchmen of high and low degree, and endless bands of pilgrims of more common clay, journeyed to the walled city by the Rhone to pay their respects to the head of the church.

The last pope to rule at Avignon was Gregory XI, who took the papal his departure Avignon was ruled by a legate, and after a time by a vice-France. In 1797 the pope renounced

Reign of Anti-Popes.

After the departure of the popeswho had brought their court to French soil owing to the turbulence of Rome -schism and disorder held sway at Avignon. Three "anti-popes" held court here, holding their place by force. One of them, Benedict XIII, when besieged by an army under Marshal Boucicault, escaped by a postern gate and fled.

One of the bloodiest atrocities in the French revolution was committed at the palace in Avignon, when sixty-one men, women and children were hurled from its highest tower into a ditch. and quicklime was thrown upon them.

The papal palace is a drowsy place to-day, basking in the torrid southern sunshine like a decaying monument to a dead past. Its drawbridge, portcullis and iron gates are gone, but the balcony where the pope stood when he blessed the people is still to be seen above the entrance. The tourist finds the palace worth a few hours' inspection; the student of church history finds it worthy of a long journey and close study.

Put Rembrandt in the Shade. Dudley Hardy, London's artist, says e admires American art and likes some American artists-but not all When asked to say more than this he tells a story to show which kind he does not like. Here it is:

"It was at Etaples, and there were two of them at the table next minetwo quite pretty girls, they wereand they talked Art at the top of their voices. First it was Titian. He failed to find approval for anything. Then it was Velasquez. He was worse than Titian, if possible. Then it was Rembrandt, and for a moment I thought he was going to be indorsed. But it was 'Rembrandt's all slick enough sometimes,' admitted one of the ladies, 'but you jes' ought to see the juicy sketch I did this mornin'!' "I swallowed my soup the wrong way and fled," adds Mr. Hardy.

The Retort Courteous.

A young lady was the object ct much teasing on account of her rat er unusual size. On one occasior she was playing tennis and jumred to strike the ball. A little man wao was present laughed uproariously and said: That reminds me of the time when the 'Cow jumped over the noon.'"
Instantly she said: "Veil, you know
