NEW YORK, Jan. 2, (P) - Franklin D. Roosevelt was inaugurated Governor of the state of New York in brief but impressive ceremonies featured by an address by former Governor Smith.

NEW YORK, Jan. 9. - The art of dining well as it used to be known is dead in the United States, according to no less an authority than Oscar of the Waldorf. Oscar is busy, as the time approaches for the raising of the famous old hotel, collecting his intrinsic reminders of 30 years at the head of the Waldorf-Astoria dining rooms and kitchens. Among his souvenirs are menus of many a feast to which to which few moderns would be equal.

WRITER GIVES VIVID DESERT AIR PICTURE

Alma Overholt, has written a very vivid description of Death Valley as seen from an airplane in the January Sunset Magazine. With the Editor's permission we re-print a part of that article which will be of interest to the readers of The Age. The article follows:

"Straight down the runway, level as a dance floor, we shot, then gradually rose higher and higher, the setting sun seeming to have suddenly gone into reverse gear and rising with us.

"What a sight! Below stretched not a desert scene, but a wind-tossed inland sea, winding sinuously southward between the now dark blue Panamints to the west and the purple Funeral Range to the east, rose-tinted by the sun's rays. The sand dunes of Stove Pipe Wells, in reality fifty to several hundred feet in height, seemed like the crests of an angry sea, frozen into immobility. From the sides of the mountains extend huge alluvial fans, silt and rock that have flowed from the side canyons in enormous quantities.

Lava columns reach from the mountain base like long giant black fingers, into what earlier in the day would have appeared as a yellow and brown desert, but now seemed a blue sea, with silvery reflections in the distances and here and there banks of snowy froth, alkali marshes, underlaid with layers of mud, crusted with salts of soda, borax and potash.

"From the air, Death Valley appeared as a fairland scene, a painting suggestive of the Catalina Channel with the undulating shore-line of the Magic Isle winding in and out, rather than the dread sink of the American Continent as it has been popularly pictured.

"Flying towards the south we were now over Salt Creek, and banked over toward the great alluvial fans. It was here that the Jayhawkers abandoned their wagons in their heart-breaking trek across Death Valley in 1849.

"A sharp contrast-flying the length of Death Valley as it stretches some 110 miles from north to south, in less than an hour, and the miserable journey of months, with death and despair as companions made by the Forty-Niners.

"Showing from the air as a narrow gulch, from 8 to 10 miles in width, hemmed in by mountain ranges on both sides with but two natural entrances on the Nevada side, and only blind canyons on the California boundary - no wonder those ill-fated people hopelessly zig-zagged back and forth from the salt marshes in the south, northward until they finally found an outlet over Townsend Pass, where they lowered their oxen over Dry Falls, a drop of 30 feet, and made their escape into Panamint Valley.

"As we flew further southward and over the Devil's Golf Course, the wide expanse of salt beds appeared like snow or fleecy clouds in a blue haze. Death Valley here narrows like a river nearing its source and bends to the southwest. Below us great yellow fingers reached out, slides of raw sulphur. Promontories coming into the valley from the east look on fantastic shapes. We seemed to fly past Seal Rocks, and now the Sphinx herself stood out in bold relief, dark blue against the roseate mountains beyond.

"Banking the plane sharply, we flew into the setting sun, still from our height nearly an hour above the horizon. We had flown southward hugging the Panamint mountains; now we were over the Funeral Range which towards the north runs into the Grape Vines. Below us projected the Death Valley Buttes, three sentinels rising 500 feet above the floor of the valley. These have been the landmark of prospectors, pioneers, Spaniards who enslaved the Indians in their mining enterprises and the Indian tribes that crossed Death Valley in prehistoric times.

"We were now above the gold belt country. Over toward the east lay Amargosa Valley and the ghost city of Rhyolite, in 1905 the center of the gold rush fever of this region. For twenty years these buildings have stood deserted, silent mementos of the wild border days when Death Valley Scotty rode on his big bay, laden with bags of gold, into public fame.

"We now flew towards Tin Mountain and on over 'Lost Wagons' where a family of pioneers was massacred by the Indians during its trek across Death Valley.

"Scotty's Ranch at the extreme northern end of the valley came into sight. Grape Vine Ranch, as it is called, has about twenty acres under cultivation, watered from a stream that comes from the canyon across a gully where Scotty is believed to have the famous cache to which he is said to go periodically for his supply of gold. We flew towards the mountains where Scotty's mine is believed to be located. Below us now yawned Marble Canyon, sheer cliffs of polished blue marble glistening like mirrors in the evening sun. Still on we flew. Time seems eternity up in a plane and the mind flies even faster than the plane. Now we beheld a huge cavern with hills of gray and redish ash banked high near by, the Ubeheba Crater, 780 feet deep and 780 feet in diameter, at the bottom, and one mile in length. "The sun was sinking low, we were losing our race with its last flickering rays, the purple shadows deepened over this mysterious valley of romance, wealth and tragedy.

"Over the Panamints we rose - higher and higher. Again we could get a last flicker of the sun. Here we picked up once more the ribbon of the Eichbaum road, 5286 feet above sea level, winding over Townsend Pass.

"Away off in the distance we could see the twinkle of lights. As we flew eastward a beam of light caught the silver wings of our plane. "It was the revolving searchlight the beacon at Stove Pipe Wells, that guides wanderers of this great, dead, dry sea to the one haven of safety and comfort. "A never-to-be-forgotten sight, the cheerful twinkle of lights below in this strange region, like a fairy city suddenly called into being through the rubbing of Aladdin's lamp. We banked and circled and now swept over Stove Pipe Wells, then shot down to the landing field, our adventure over."

DEATH RATES It is encouraging to know that the death rate per 1000 dropped off nearly one per cent for the year 1927, in which year the rate was 11.4 as compared with 12.2 in 1926.

COAL Liberty Coal National Ice Co. Every delay, which means a day, in placing your order for the winter's supply of coal can mean a loss to you, because local dealers cannot control prices and a cost-at-mine advance means you must pay accordingly. Then too, delivery now means a good-first-grade coal at minimum cost, whereas rush delivery when winter storms and cold blow, may mean that you'll be glad to have inferior mining at any price.
