By RUSSELL J. NEWLAND (Associated Press Sports Writer) SAN FRANCISCO, April 4, (AP)—The boxing game is crammed with oddities but in two cases out of this way, nature has turned the rules topsy-turvy to furnish something out of the ordinary. The land of "little brown men" has produced a veritable giant while the United States, where big strong men thrive, has a representative mite in this section who scales 102 pounds for ring business.

AL ROBINSON DAN AGUINALDO

From the Philippines has come Pantaleon Maniala, a 23-year-old native youth who towers above his countrymen and packs 175 pounds. He fights under the name of Pan Aguinado and is 5 feet 9 1/2 inches tall. The midget is Al Robinson, just barely 4 1/2 to over-balance a standard six pack of potatoes. Too light, even for the tiniest Filipinos here, he usually has to concede from eight to fifteen pounds in a bout. Robinson is 21 years old but a veteran in the ring, with five years' experience and 100 battles behind him.

J. J. "Moose" Taussig, noted boxing authority who has worked in their corners of such former champions as Jim Jeffries, Jack Johnson and Jack Dempsey, claims the "world's featherweight title" for his little fellow.

Aguinado, born in Maniala, is working his way through the University of California in a mechanical engineering course. He came to this country with no thought of entering the prize ring, but the success of many Filipino friends started him off on the fistie trail. He is managed by Mike Mc-

Clure, veteran who fought Stanley Ketchell, Joe Thomas and others. Pan is the only Filipino light heavyweight old-time ring follower of this region ever heard of. For a country where natives average 5 feet or less in height, he is a rarity of the first water. One former resident of Manila, a city of 300,000 persons, said that during his stay there he saw only three natives of a near 6-foot size.

PLANES SPEED FINDS FOR ARCHEOLOGISTS LONDON, April 4, (AP)—There is nothing musty in the new methods of British archeologists. They are doing it with airplanes.

Using planes as eye-pieces, whereby to look back 50 centuries from ore, is not only new, but is astonishingly simple. From far above the earth, markings left by ancient man, that are not recognizable close at hand, become etchings with tell-tale characteristics.

Geometrical design is one key to these puzzle-pictures. Ancient man laid out fortifications for the best of fighting uses, which required a regularity that the archeological eye is skilled in detecting. Some patterns bear the impress of religious, superstitious or calendar usages.

Archeologists know what types of wrinkles in mother earth's modern skin denote abodes of men long gone. They study these markings on aerial photographs. Such photography revealed the site of Woodhenge, in Wiltshire, considered a prototype of the famous Stonehenge.

Fliers have mapped the supposed site of Boadicea's almost mythical capital, near Norwich. In Arabian deserts British planes have located markings that some archeologists believe will disclose a period when there was perhaps a different, damper climate and a more sizable population.

England within the year has pushed her own island's family tree back to 15,000 years ago by archeological relics. She competes with Egypt as a rich field for archeological research. In the year just closed more than $250,000,000 has been spent for excavation in the isles.

Sussex and Wiltshire are turning up relics of stone age cave dwellers. On down the line, through the bronze age, Roman days, the early Vikings are less distinctly identified peoples, the archeologist is adding to England's long history.
