About New York

By RICHARD G. MASSOCK

NEW YORK, April 13.—Any list of class distinctions prevailing in democratic New York must take into consideration a division of the citizens which has become quite definite in recent years.

The two groups resulting from that division may be called, for purposes of identification, the participants and the spectators.

Whenever and wherever anything out of the ordinary takes place, the new caste and outcaste, figuratively speaking, are in evidence. Whether it's a parade for a current hero or the first showing of a movie special, there are always present those who take part and those who merely look on.

The same classes of course exist to some extent almost everywhere but probably nowhere else have they become so much a part of the daily scene.

Star Gazing

Celebrities naturally are the chief attraction on any occasion.

Let Al Smith attend a theater ever so unostentatiously and the audience gives him a big hand as one did just the other night. Let Grover Whalen personally introduce a new traffic system and the sidewalk soon is overflowing with the curious. Let the premiere floodlights be turned on a theater and a throng stands for hours to witness the arrival and departure of Otto Kahn, Fannie Hurst, Mayor Walker, Hope Hampton, Texas Guinan and the rest of the first-nighting proms.

The most recent instance was the Fifth Avenue Easter parade, which brought out more spectators as well as participants, than it had in several years. Surely not all could have been waiting to see what the well-dressed were wearing, nor merely to witness the fashionable spectacle spread out before them in the shifting panorama. Not, at any rate, those who flanked the church doors. They were looking for a Rockefeller or a Jackie Coogan. And as ever, when an obscure reporter ducked out, they seemed just a little resentful that he was not a Peggy Joyce, at least.
