NAN CARROLL was Attorney John Morgan's capable private secretary . . . "Almost a junior partner in the firm," insisted Willis Todd, Nan's only "boy friend." It was Willis, too, who made Nan realize that she really was in love with Morgan . . . Morgan who idolized his beautiful, selfish wife, Iris. Shocked at finding herself in love with a married man, Nan decided to resign her position. Circumstances made this impossible, however, on the day that she had planned and before she could carry out her resolve, a swift series of thrilling happenings threatened to change the course of six lives.

Pinchot, N. Y.

"Rival Wives," Miss Austin's new serial, is decidedly different in type than "The Black Pigeon," but it continues its author's reputation for absorbing realism. Circumstances which face the characters in "Rival Wives" are thrilling and unusual. But the reader is never able to lose sight of the fact that the characters are real. When you learn the problems that face Nan Carroll, John Morgan, Iris, his wife, and Bert Crawford, you will want to read the solution. It is this quality in Miss Austin's writing that produces a compelling element of suspense.
