Balloon-Plane Dreams Futile, Inventors Told

WASHINGTON, March 30, UP Take it from the national advisory committee for aeronautics, if you seek to improve aircraft, that the answer is not in putting wings on gas bags or gas bags on airplanes The federal committee, which passed on nearly 1.000 aeronautical inventions in 1930, has received an average of 100 proposals annually for the last three years to join lighter than -air and heavier-than air types.

I: has a stock answer for hybrid designs, summing its objections in quotation from C. P. Burgess, in book on aircraft design, that "such a craft combines the disad-vantages and loses the merits of both types in a peculiarly complete manner

Would Still Need Engine

The combination craft, committee studies show, would be heavier then air. It would depend like an airplane upon the power of its engines to keep it aloft, and require high speed for take-offs and landings. Besides the difficully of conceiving a necessarily huge craft running fast along a field for its takeoff, and of constructing landing bears able to withstand the shock of striking the ground at high
