A WASHINGTON BYSTANDER

By KIRKE SIMPSON

WASHINGTON—A long time ago, when the clamor of civil war beat upon the ears of the nation, a 15-year old boy out in Ohio, youngest of a dozen brothers, pulled with desire to shoulder arms and march away to the front. He was too young for that, so he took to a drum for his weapon and made off for the battle anyhow, a six months' volunteer.

The lad's name was John S. Stots. He was so eager to see action in the Union armies, where five of his eleven brothers already were serving that at the expiration of his drummer-boy enlistment he joined again, this time totting a gun after having been a bit liberal in stating his age to the recruiting officer. Two days after his re-enlistment he was wounded, captured and escaped. A hospital set him right for action again, and back he went to rejoin his regiment at the front. But on his way to rejoin, passing through a Virginia town, he was caught up for service in a provisional fighting unit sent out along a railroad, was again wounded and sent back to a Washington hospital.

BRANDED A DESERTER That wound incapacitated him for future service, so he was told to go home on an informal furlough. The war ended, Stots, still crippled by his wound, went to Iowa, married, reared a family and then, twenty-seven years after he had served, made his first pension application only to find himself carried on the rolls as a deserter.

There was no official record of him after his first wound. Stots died more than thirty years ago. He was a bitterly disappointed man to find himself thus caught in a net of red tape from which he could find no escape. He even appeared personally to President McKinley, whose own youthful service in that war played so large a part in his advancement to the White House.

Iowa member of house or senate whose names ranked high in counsels of the nation and their party, men like Jim Good and Senator Allison, all tried to help overcome that gap in the records.

COLE CLEARS RECORD It was not until Representative Cyrenus Cole began a seven year labor that events actually moved to clear the record of Stots and grant him, three decades after his death, the boon he craved, honorable discharge. The bill went through before the seventy-first congress died.

"And I feel that nothing that I have been able to do in congress, or that I may do hereafter will give me more pleasure than the passage of this bill," Cole said at the time.

"Governor Hunt Fights On and On"

(From L. A. Times) Dear Gov. Hunt: I note what you say about Arizona just beginning to fight, after reading what the supreme court said about the fight being all over, and then I went back and read what the court said again. Maybe in your copy of the decision you got the impression it said, "It is all over but the shouting, and you are now furnishing the shouting, but I couldn't find anything like that in mine. On the other hand, it doesn't say you can't shut it if it relieves your feelings any. You speak out like a true follower of Andrew Jackson, who when the supreme court disagreed with him, once remarked, "The court has made its decision; now let it enforce it." The court did. That did not faze Jackson. Of course, what Jackson said didn't faze the court any, either. Governor, you just keep right on ignoring anything the court says. In the meantime, the hard-rock boys over at Black Canyon will keep right on digging and blasting and everybody will be happy. The supreme court doesn't care what you use for a political issue. In fact, I doubt if they find it out. The Colorado has been good for several elections in Arizona so far, and I expect it will be good for a few more. So, Governor, the thing for you to do is to fight on, just as you said. The bell has rung, the referee has counted ten and the crowd is leaving. But you can put on a post-mortem shadow-boxing exhibition and tell the supreme court where to head in. JUSTICE.

GUIDING YOUR CHILD

By MRS. AGNES LYNE HOLDING GRUDGES

Some people go through life unable to forget any wrong that has been done to them. Since we all are bound to be wronged now and then and to suffer from injustice both great and small, it is well to be able to discard at least those grudges which held over, can never do us any conceivable good.

The tendency to nurse one's resentment is developed through the treatment received in childhood and the example set by parents and others in authority. Johnny breaks his mother's vase and is punished for it, but for weeks following, whenever his mother is angry or annoyed, she reminds him of it. Because his mother continues to hold an old score against him he feels an increasing resentment and so he develops a standing grudge of his own.

Children also develop a chronic feeling of resentment when they are constantly made to feel inferior or if they suffer from the belief that they are unloved.

In every day of a child's life there should be some happening which augments his self esteem, some task well done for which he is praised, some act of consideration, or some contribution to the conversation which makes him feel that he is a fine, good child and that he counts for something. Never in the day to day life of the family should there be anything which makes him doubt for long his place in his parents' affection. The feeling of security, of being well loved, of proper self esteem, all help to make the kind of individual to whom each day brings a fresh start.

Maybe the movie stars must diet to stay thin, but the plot seems to stay that way without effort.—Eaton Express.

FIVE-LANGUAGE CROONING SCORES FOR COAST SINGER

SAN FRANCISCO, May 22. (AP)—From headlines to broadcasting is the experience of Adele Burian. The KYA crooner had a tough time after the World War in her native Austria and saw some of the Russian revolution before she came to America in 1922. Her parents and grandparents were musicians and singers in the old world, and she completed her musical education here—hoping to go on the concert stage. By accident she "crooned" over the mike and made a tremendous hit by singing popular songs in five languages. Now she's doing it daily. Miss Burian with her relatives stood in lines in Vienna after the war for her daily rations.
