He stands with strange fluids in two test tubes and, as he pours them together there is an explosion. As he inhales the fumes that rise about him, his hair turns from white to black and the deep lines of age disappear from his face. GUIDING YOUR CHILD

IRRITATING VIRTUES
By Mrs. Agnes Lyne

It is unhappily true that often we permit ourselves to be annoyed with children for the very things about which we should be pleased and proud.

The mother of a two-year-old, for instance, confessed that she was sorry that she had taught him to feed himself for he now refused to let her touch his spoon, while she fumed and fretted with impatience because his slowness often made them late on their visits and errands.

An independent child with ideas of his own, with vitality which keeps him active except when he is asleep is notoriously a difficult handful.

It can hardly help but be inconvenient to have a child so bent upon his own purposes (usually the sort that upset the quiet orderliness of the home) that he is none too ready to comply with our demands and has not the slightest interest in that time honored virtue of childhood—to be seen, but not heard.

The natural noisiness of a vigorous, healthy child is another cross to parents. Yet how much better it is for a child to be somewhat objectionable on that score than to be hushed, docile and cowed.

While it is necessary that he learn increasingly to be considerate, during the first years at least, eagerness for experience, activity and self-assertion are far better indications of proper development than meekness, quietness and passivity.

The art of bringing up a child really is nothing more than knowing how gradually to civilize him without at any point breaking his will.

Meanwhile the most necessary part of our equipment for parenthood remains an infinite love and patience, and a sympathetic insight which understands the child's point of view.
