TELEVISION TUBE SHOWS FOUR FOOT RADIO MOVIES

Photograph taken in the laboratory of Philo T. Farnsworth, young television engineer, showing reproduction of a Mary Pickford film on receiver using his special television tube.

SAN FRANCISCO, June 4 (P)—Laboratory experiments looking to the transmission of television by means of electrical rather than mechanical scanning appear to be passing the preliminary stages.

In fact, Philo T. Farnsworth, 24-year-old engineer who has been investigating the possibilities of television through the use of special tubes in both transmitter and receiver, replacing scanning disks and neon lamps, believes his process is nearly ready for possible practical use.

Announcement by Television Laboratories, Inc., the organization with which Farnsworth is associated, was that radio pictures have been reproduced with all the detail of a newspaper halftone.

As far as clarity and flicker are concerned, it was added that the pictures were somewhat better than the early movies with an intensity sufficient for possible enlargement up to four feet square.

Because a transmitted television signal is similar to that of sound, it has many of the interference properties that hinder reception of broadcast and other types of radio transmission.

There is also a tendency to a slight "sway" or fading in the reception of the pictures from left to right, but this, it was said, will be overcome.

In the laboratory tests, pictures were received on a screen slightly larger than a foot square. This screen consists of ordinary tracing paper.

The screen can be removed and a larger picture obtained by turning the receiver toward a wall and focusing the image on a silvered screen or white cloth.

At the laboratory demonstration the picture was thrown on an ordinary kalsomined wall and increased to four feet square.

Previously the large flat end of the receiving tube, a specially built vacuum device that replaced scanning disk and neon lamp, was used. With the improved method the picture is reflected by a mirror to the tracing paper screen.
