GIRL FLIERS FOUND BY U.P.

(Copyright, 1932, United Press) HARRISBURG, Pa., Jan. 7. (U.P.)—Crushed in the wreckage of their big white plane, the bodies of Mrs. Ruth Stewart and Mrs. Debbie Stanford, wealthy amateur aviators, were found today in the storm-swept woods of Sherman mountain by the United Press.

J. Paul Lukens, pilot, and a United Press staff correspondent, circling over the drab peaks of Pennsylvania's mountain range in an airplane, first sighted evidence of the tragedy. Unable to land in the desolate terrain, they returned by automobile to discover the bodies.

Mrs. Stewart, an expert flier, was beneath the engine of the crumpled plane. Mrs. Stanford, cut in the head, was in the wreckage of the cabin. It is believed Mrs. Stewart who was piloting the plane, died almost instantly. Mrs. Stanford may have lived some time, although her injuries probably rendered her unconscious.

CHICAGO, Jan. 6. (U.P.)—Greta Garbo of the alabaster skin, the mysterious smile and the propensity to snub New Yorkers, explained today why she gave would-be interviewers in the east the run-around.

"I doan leek mos' people," she smiled upon changing trains here for Hollywood to resume her movie work. "I am mos' happy to be far, far away from New York. They are so impert in New York. They geev me no peace. Now I feel happier far away."

La Garbo, the former Stockholm barber shop lather girl, high-hatted New York columnists by registering in a hotel as "Gussie Berger," and wearing smoked glasses to deceive them when she went in and out during her Christmas vacation.

They made such a hullabaloo that she apparently changed her mind about talking to people. She answered all questions amiably during her hour in Chicago, even those concerning love.

"No, I eem not in luf. No, I eem not evah to marry. No, I eem not to stop playing in the movies. I eem not weary of them. They are my life."

VIOLA BURNS, City Clerk.

By W. W. ANDERSON GREENVILLE, S. C., Jan. 7. (U.P.)—Some day David Waldie may buy a new overcoat—but not yet. Why should he? He's worn the one he has now only 32 years. Furthermore, the Canadian-born Scot, entirely free of personal shopping problems, has worn one hat 15 years, one pair of gloves 20 years and for 38 years has carried a cane that is a mere 323 years old.

And Waldie declares that he expects to use all of them 20 years longer and that his grandson, a University of South Carolina senior, will inherit them to use as long as possible.

The coat is made of heavier cloth, has good weight and is in excellent condition.

"My father bought it at Gananogue, Canada — my birthplace—in 1897," Waldie said. "He died two years later and, as the coat was a good fit for me, mother gave it to me. I've worn it every winter since."

The collar has been altered several times, but the remainder of the coat has gone untouched. There are no moth holes in the fabric. Waldie said he hangs the coat in the sun after every rainy season to prevent that.

From the pocket of the coat he pulled a pair of gloves of fine, soft leather. They are only 20 years old and remain in the pocket of the coat except when Waldie wears them.

He picked up the knitted cane with a carved sphinx-like face as he talked.

"This I have had for 38 years," he said, and explained that it was made in Scotland and had come to him from an uncle who said it was 300 years old.

"Here is my hat. I wear this all the time," he said as he picked up a fuzzy fedora.

"It's practically new. I've had this only 15 years."

David Waldie of Greenville, S. C., still wears the overcoat his father bought in 1897. But overcoat factories aren't alone in wishing that the Scot's clothes were not so long-lasting—as the picture indicates.
