BETTING MONEY

DIPLMACY seems to have reached the stage between nations of betting big money. At least we are moved to that idea by the declaration of the British Premier, Ramsey McDonald, that he is anxious to have the British Government return to the gold standard, providing, of course, that the United States will do the same.

It was all perfectly all right with the British Premier while his government was off the gold standard and our's was still standing staunchly for it. Because under such circumstances the British had all the best of it. They were able to manufacture more cheaply than we could and send her low priced goods to America and undersell American manufacturers even after paying the duty.

But the moment America abandons the gold standard so as to put her currency on the same debased level as that of the British and other governments, and thereby enable us to compete on equal terms industrially, it is at once apparent to the British Premier that we should all return to the gold standard.

SILVER COMES IN

THE BRITISH PREMIER might well consider the plight into which the policy of the British government toward India has put, not England alone, but the world.

The British government demonitized silver in India. At least that is what it appears like. In other words, they said to the hundreds of millions of the Indian population that their silver money was not money at all but just pieces of metal. They changed silver in India from a money to a commodity.

It is true, perhaps, that silver had not been established by law as a money on any particular parity with gold. Nevertheless, by the customs of trade and commerce, by the traditions of generations, silver was used and accepted as money by the Oriental nations. Indeed, they had no other money, because gold is unknown there. So when Great Britain bluntly told the Indians that their silver was not money, silver at once lost its value in their eyes.

India had been for generations, the vast reservoir into which most of the silver produced by the mines of the world flowed. Silver became their family treasure and their fortunes were counted in stores of that metal.

However, waking up to the sad reality that their money was no good, their treasure of little value and being informed that they had to pay four dollars of their money for what before they had willingly, because of established customs and traditions, paid but two, the Indian people as well as the people of all Oriental nations, just stopped buying the goods of the world. It immediately became cheaper for them to manufacture their own. So the action of Great Britain in debasing silver in India, closed many of the industries of England and heaped a tremendous new burden upon the distressed peoples of that country. The entire world, including the United States, suffered from the British action.

So now we find that Japan and other Oriental nations are able to manufacture and sell to the United States articles which until recently we exported. The debased silver has helped close the industries of America.

So, if our friend, Ramsey McDonald, now sees that it was bad policy to attempt the financial ruin of India in order to insure the financial supremacy of London, we may properly consider the policy of resuming, or retaining, because we are hardly yet off it, the gold standard for our measure of values.
