WATER AT WHAT COST?

The Arizona governor's message to the state legislature asking the investigation of the feasibility of taking water from the upper canyon stretches of the Colorado river and make delivery of such waters to the Verde valley, would be very instructive to thousands of people within the state. To those who are acquainted with the topography of the country, however, the plan seems impractical.

To pump the water out of a mile deep canyon and carry it over one of the most rugged, rough and mountainous sections of the state would incur an inconceivable cost. To tunnel the high plateau at a depth of three to four thousand feet or more seems at least impractical, if not impossible. Rock pressures and movements at such depths are not unusual. The waste rock would have to be taken to the surface through a series of shafts. Shafts of sufficient depth would be an expense almost beyond comprehension. Earth movements would be a constant danger and would likely destroy the effectiveness of the entire project at any moment.

Even if the project could be made workable, the resulting cost of the water would be such that it could not be profitably used after delivery. The Colorado river flows in a canyon from the junction of the Grand and Green rivers to the lower end of Black canyon. E. C. LaRue, in Water Supply Paper 395 of the U. S. Geological Survey of the Department of the Interior, says: "In the 616-mile section of the Colorado from Cottonwood valley (at the mouth of Black Canyon) no water will ever be diverted for irrigation." Such is in brief the report of Mr. LaRue, a nationally known engineer, after several years of comprehensive study and investigation of the Colorado river.—Mohave County (Arizona) Miner.
