Lake Mead Is Growing Fast

Lake Mead, the world's largest man-made body of water, which was created in the deserts of Arizona and Nevada by construction of Boulder Dam, again is growing.

Each day it is getting bigger and better and it is about to attain its first 100 miles in length as it traps water running off the mountains in the spring.

Ten million acre-feet of water, enough to cover the states of Massachusetts, Connecticut and Rhode Island to a depth of a foot with more than enough left over to put twelve inches on Delaware, now is impounded in this scenic reservoir.

John C. Page, commissioner of reclamation, reported to Secretary of the Interior Harold L. Ickes, in announcing the growth of Lake Mead, that the indications are enough water will be caught and stored by Boulder Dam this spring to put the operations of Boulder Dam power plant on a firm or continuous power basis in June.

At the end of March in 1936, Lake Mead held but 3,500,000 acre-feet of water. An additional 6,500,000 acre-feet has been caught and stored in Lake Mead in twelve months. This amount represents water surplus to the needs of the irrigators downstream from Boulder Dam, water which would have been wasted to flow unused into the Gulf of California had not Boulder Dam been constructed.

The approach of spring in the vast water-shed of the Colorado river has increased the flow of the stream to the point where now each day several thousand acre-feet in excess of that which is by-passed through the Boulder Dam power plant to irrigators in Arizona and Southern California is being added to the storage in Lake Mead.

Lake Mead today is ninety-eight miles long and covers 67,500 acres. Its placid waters have opened to easy approach by tourists magnificent canyons which until two years ago could be entered only at peril to life and limb.

The flow of the Colorado river will increase gradually until the spring flood arrives late in May. The normal annual flow of the stream is in excess of 17,000,000 acre-feet. Most of this water comes rolling down the river in the spring flood. The runoff from July to March could be handled by a creek and is far too small and unreliable adequately to serve the irrigation farmers along the course of the river. Below Boulder Dam the river has been regulated so that ample water flows the year around.

Early indications this year are that the runoff of the river will be somewhat less than normal proportions. There is every indication, however, that the flow will be large enough to fill Lake Mead to the point where the power plant at Boulder Dam can be placed on a firm power basis. When this is done the revenue from the sale of power at the plant will be greatly increased. The power now is being sold at the dump or secondary power rate of one-half mill per kilowatt hour, measured in falling water. The firm power rate is 1.63 mills.
