

Junction for the first time, during the past summer. The Rambler had been observin' Doc Shrum, up at the hospital, for several weeks past, saunterin' about town, gettin' down on his knees, examinin' pools of water with a magnifyin' glass, but he never found a thing. Young McCullough, however, visited the very same pools and with proper equipment and acquired, expert knowledge, soon showed us that there were millions of mosquitoes, and many more developin' right in our midst—if you know how to find 'em. He simply used a small ladle having a white inner surface, ground for detecting the dark-colored little wigglers, floating or darting about in the water. It requires about seven or eight days for the mosquitoes to develop from the egg, or larval, stage, to the fully matured mosquito, ready to "take off," "go to town," so to speak, fly off from their hatching point, and get busy at sucking blood. It was all very interesting. (Continued on Page Twelve)
