

New Era in Use of Paint Looms Ahead

PAIN'T was a much treasured luxury in Colonial days, according to Ernest T. Trigg, president of the National Paint, Varnish and Lacquer Association. "As it became easier to obtain materials for its manufacture," Mr. Trigg says, "the paint and varnish makers widened their distribution and did what they could to improve their products, but it was not until after the World War that the paint chemist entered the picture as an important factor and radical changes occurred."

Before the war, it seems, little attention was paid to chemical research by paint makers—or by many other manufacturers, for that matter. During and after the war, however, came the growth of the American chemical industry and paint manufacturers pricked up their ears.

"In the years since the World War," states Mr. Trigg, "much has taken place in the paint industry. Coatings of every type are reaching a new high in serviceability, chemists with their microscopes and test tubes are developing new methods of manufacture—tests are being made constantly to make coatings more durable, more enduring in color, longer lasting, faster drying

"In the not-far-distant future, still another important figure will come on the scene—the paint stylist. The recently organized Council for Paint Styling is now deep in preliminary surveys of decorating preferences of builders and home owners in every section of the country. Before long property owners will be checking up on painting styles before they choose a color scheme for their houses—just as a woman window-shops and scans fashion magazines before she buys new clothing."
