"Sensation" of 1893 Home Becomes Relic Alongside 1938 Washers

YOUNG housewives will have difficulty believing that the queer-looking contraption shown here is a household washing machine.

Grandmothers and great-grandmothers will easily recognize it for what it is, despite the fact that it bears no resemblance to the sleek, shining models of today.

This washer is 45 years old. When found by an enterprising washer salesman it had been used for the entire period by a Wisconsin family which sentimentally clung to the back-breaker in spite of the advancement that has been made in design and efficiency in almost a half-century since this was a sensation of American inventive genius.

It is hard to imagine that this hand-operated washing machine, working like a cradle and slowly, laboriously, cleansing clothes after a fashion, ever was hailed as a sign of a new day for overworked womanhood, but it was an exciting innovation once upon a time, just as today's more-than-13,000,000 washers are regarded as simply routine home equipment by the housewives who own them.
