Blaming The Banks For Too Much Money

It's a human failing to blame the "other fellow" for an unfortunate condition. And America's banks have been the "other fellow" to a wide extent. One of the most common criticisms of banks has been to blame them for the "idle money" that reposes in their vaults, out of productive use.

Disorder Is Fire's Very Best Friend

Destructive fire has many allies. And one of the most potent is disorder. The workshop where sawdust is allowed to remain on the floor, where paints and varnishes and solvents are stored improperly, and where cleaning rags are dropped in helter-skelter fashion here and there, is obviously far more prone to fire than the shop where refuse is immediately removed and supplies are kept neatly in safe containers. That goes as well for the corner garage, store or machine shop. Many a major fire has resulted from an innocent looking pile of waste rags in a backroom.

Remember, too, those hit-and-miss repairs you made on lamp cords—amateur electric work accounts for millions of dollars of fire loss each year.

Make that fire-prevention tour of your property today. It will be a miracle if you don't find hazards you didn't know existed.
