HELPING CHILDREN TO ENJOY THEIR FOOD
by SONDRA REID

It is important that you give children a chance to rest and relax before eating so that they will not be too tired to eat. A new food is best introduced at the beginning of a meal when children are hungry. Don't be discouraged if they take only a taste for the first few times. Serve only one new food at a time, giving them a chance to learn to like it before trying another. Generally foods should not be mixed, for children should like each food for its own taste. Food likes and dislikes should not be discussed before children. They should learn to like all foods.

Make sure the child is comfortably seated with a place to rest his feet, and that it is easy for him to see and reach his food. It is an older person's responsibility to see that children are safe. When a child is old enough to climb into his high chair, give a positive suggestion like, "Hold on with both hands when you climb into your chair." This tells a child much more than, "Watch out! You'll fall." It also gives him confidence. A timid child may have to have his hand held for a few times, but he should be encouraged to do things for himself.

Provide little children with large bibs and let them eat where spilled food can be cleaned up without damage. Easily managed silver, plates with rims, and glasses which do not tip easily are other aids to self-feeding. Don't expect young children to be neat about eating.
