

Blast Proposed Museum Moving

NEW YORK, N.Y. --Negro leaders in Brooklyn have expressed "unalterable" opposition to having the Brooklyn Children's Museum moved from its antiquated quarters in Crown Heights, claiming the proposed move was racially inspired.

The move was weighed at a meeting of the Board of Trustees of the Brooklyn Institute of Arts and Sciences, parent organization of the 65-year-old institution at Brooklyn Ave. and Park Place.

Several trustees cited economy and accessibility as the primary reasons for considering construction of a new museum adjoining the Brooklyn Museum, on Eastern Parkway and Washington Avenue.

But the borough's Negro leaders charged that the proposed move was racially inspired. Crown Heights, once an all-white community, is rapidly becoming integrated.

"The minute there is a transition to an integrated community, services have been moved out," said Robert Palmer, director of the John F. Kennedy Job Orientation in Neighborhoods Center, in nearby Bedford-Stuyvesant. Palmer is chairman of the Borough President's Community Planning Board No. 6, which encompasses both Crown Heights and Bedford-Stuyvesant.

Assemblyman T. R. Jones, Democrat of Brooklyn, charged that the museum's two century-old mansions had been allowed to deteriorate to justify moving.

"The Negro community regards this as an act of deliberate sabotage," he said.
