 apply uncommon energy and determination. Step out of your car, and a swarm of them quickly gathers. One regular thrusts out a hand-lettered card saying "Deaf and Dumb Please Help Me, Friend." He becomes voluble with curses if you do not give him "dash"—a West African term covering everything from bribe to tip.
 THE OBJECT OF BOTH ENVY AND SCORN among stay-at-home Nigerians are "Been Tos." These are young people who managed to study or work overseas and usually returned home to well-paid government or professional jobs.
 "Been Tos" are envied their educational opportunity, but scorned if they stress how much better life is in London, or wherever they have been.
 Nigeria has all the national status symbols new African nations seem to require. She appears better able than most to support her national airline and shipping, new universities and breweries and four television stations.

The coming of television to the white man's grave demonstrated the clash between the traditional and the new. Installment buying was stymied in the Moslem northern region when those who defaulted on payments foiled collectors by placing receivers in harems which are strictly off limits to outsiders.
 Juju magic men in Lagos acquired TV film spools and used them to diagnose illness. These film bobbins were dropped on the ground, and the type of ailment determined by whether "Kodak" or "Made in England" was face up when the spool stopped rolling.
