THE DEVIL'S FOOTPRINTS

PROBABLY no unsolved mystery has puzzled scientists more than the oft-told, never-refuted, never-explained story of the Devil's Footprints. On the morning of February 8, 1855, residents of Devonshire, England, woke to find in the snow strange tracks traversing their communities. The tracks were four inches long, two and three-quarters inches wide and were found in and around the towns of Topsham, Lympstone, Exmouth, Teignmouth and Dawlish—covering a distance of about 100 miles.

The people did not know of any animal that could make such tracks, but that was just the beginning. Whatever the animal, it could perform miracles. The tracks ran across the ground, up house sides, across roofs and down the other side. The London Times reported: "The footprints were seen in all kinds of inaccessible places—on the tops of houses and narrow walks, in gardens and courtyards enclosed by high walls and palings, as well as in open fields."

But the tracks had other amazing qualities. They always measured exactly eight inches apart and ran in an exactly
