INFORMATION

A New Rig for Night Fishing

THE HIGH-LOW RIG is most popular over the world for both fresh water and salt water fishing. We recommend this rig for crappie fishermen.

The basic difference between the standard high-low, 2-hook rig, and the usual rig used in local waters, is that the sinker is on the bottom of the rig below the hooks, rather than pinched on the line above the hooks.

The 3-way swivels, as illustrated, are not absolutely necessary, but they are strongly recommended because they eliminate line twisting which has driven many night fishermen straight out of their skulls. When the fish are biting fast and your damn rig gets twisted and ties itself into the "unknown knot", you will wish you had used the 3-way swivels.

THE MOST IMPORTANT advantage of the standard high-low rig is that with the sinker on the end of the line, there is no chance of the line whipping itself around the tip of the rod, and tying itself into those impossible knots everytime you lay your rod down.

Another valuable feature of this "sinker-on-the-bottom" rig, is that it out-foxes those sneak-thief crappies who ease up under your bait and swim toward the surface with it. If you don't happen to see your line go slack, you never know that the cagey crappie has stolen your bait without even shaking the most sensitive rod. When the foxy crappie tries this trick, the sinker on the bottom catches him dead in the act. Use a heavy sinker. One ounce is ideal.

Once you rig-up with the high-low method, you will catch the sneak thieves and, at the same time, keep your cool. You won't get any more tip-of-the-rod tangles, but you will get more fish.

USE A LONG ROD, not less than 6-1/2 feet. Place the sinker about 18 inches below the bottom hook, and have the top hook 3 feet above the bottom hook. You will catch more crappie with less sweat.
