Discovering a Black Past

In 1820, at the age of 15, Maria Bcraft opened a school in Washington, D.C. for girls of her race. Then, in 1831, she turned the school over to a former student and joined the Sisters of Providence in Baltimore, which was a teaching order for Black nuns.

While at Tuskegee Institute, George Washington Carver extracted wonderful things from the Alabama soil. His work with the peanut and sweet potato yielded unheard of products such as ink, cooking oils, peanut butter, rope and other commodities beneficial to man.

Prince Hall, a free Negro, veteran of the Revolutionary War and founder of the Negro Masonic order, spoke out for equal education in Boston in 1788. When the Government of Massachusetts offered black children only segregated classrooms, Prince Hall established a school for black children in his own home.
